THE POLITICS OF CITATION AND CALL TO ACTION

Join us for a discussion about citation practices and academic careers. Cite Black Women is a collective that calls on academics to critically reflect on their everyday practices of citation and start to consciously question how they can incorporate black women into the core of their work. Citation practices create institutional barriers and result from differences in research interests that connect to a researcher's identity. The Center for Theory presents Dr. Yasmiyn Irizarry to encourage discourse about the institutional biases at play in research and the promotion process.
